ORAL CONTRACEPTIVES FOR HOGS??

AUBURN, Ala. (AP) — Auburn University researchers are working on a new way to control the growing number of wild hogs that destroy millions of Alabama crops each year. It's an oral contraceptive. Assistant professor Steve Ditchkoff says researchers are working on an oral contraceptive that is specific for wild hogs and won't affect other animals, such as deer. He says contraceptives have been used before to control wild animal populations, including wild horses, but there is none yet for wild hogs. Ditchkoff says the contraceptive would be distributed in bait, such as corn.

Agricultural officials estimate that wild hogs did $44 million in damage to Alabama cropland last year. The Alabama Farmers Federation is sponsoring Auburn's research.

ANIMAL RIGHTS ACTIVISTS HAVE A SCREW LOOSE!!

August 16, 2010 - Animal agriculture was under attack at the Animal Rights 2010 Conference and the Humane Society of the United States-hosted Taking Action for Animals, two of the nation's largest animal rights events. Both meetings were held in Washington, D.C. during July 2010.

AR 2010 and TAFE brought together more than 1,000 activists to discuss the political strategy of the animal rights movement. Speakers at both conferences provided participants with tactics to target the animal agriculture industry through demonstrations, litigation, and ballot initiative campaigns. Animal activist leaders taught attendees how to utilize social media tools to fundraise and share videos from undercover operations.

While HSUS launched TAFE in 2005 in an attempt to distance itself from the violent tactics embraced by many attendees of the AR 2010 conference, the core messaging and highly emotional images used to promote veganism at both events was eerily similar.

Both conferences encouraged attendees to prey on the fears of the unknowing public by spreading misinformation about the way today's farmers and ranchers care for their animals. As evidence of the animal rights movement's focus on animal agriculture, some of TAFE's most popular sessions included "Advocating for Animals in Congress" and "Building a Better Future for Farm Animals." AR 2010 workshops included "Understanding the Mentality of Meat," "Conducting Investigations," and "Marketing Our Message."

Key Quotes from AR 2010 and TAFE Speakers:

"We should distinguish our message from less meat, because what we want is no meat." - Carrie Packwood Freeman, Activist and Professor at Georgia State University. AR 2010

"Owning animals is the equivalent of slavery." - Hope Bohanec, In Defense of Animals. AR 2010

"I have no problem with breaking and entering, destroying labs, burning buildings, and busting open cages." - Camille Hankins, Win Animals Rights and spokesperson for Animal Liberation Front. AR 2010

"The point at which society moves towards our views is a point where we are significantly closer to the vegan world that we are all working toward." - Bruce Friedrich, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals. AR 2010

"The dog they walked last night is no different than the pig they ate for breakfast."
- Jerry Cesak, Radio Personality and Proponent of HSUS' 'Yes on Prop 2' Campaign. TAFE

"Any state with an initiative process is on our radar." - Jennifer Hillman, Humane Society of the United States. TAFE

"I dream of a vegan world - that's where I want everything to go." - Gene Baur, Farm Sanctuary. TAFE
While HSUS' leadership continues to assert that animal rights- not animal welfare- is a mainstream issue, supporters of the movement seem divided. Many of its loudest proponents also advocate for violence, destruction of property, and abolition of pets - tactics that the American public would certainly not condone.

Most people do not understand the real - and devastating - consequences that animal rights activists are steadily pushing for. As shown by the attendance and content of the AR 2010 and TAFE conferences, the movement is relying more on legislation and less on shock tactics to gain momentum. The threat to animal agriculture is real and cannot be ignored by the industry.

Bryan Monell, an activist who has frequently obtained illicit employment at farms and research facilities in order to obtain undercover video footage, mocked the work of both farmers and researchers during his presentation at AR 2010.

"These people are rednecks and we are superior," he said.

An appearance by photographer and reality television personality Nigel Barker added to the party-like atmosphere of TAFE. Speakers at both meetings compared their cause to the civil rights and women's rights movements. The crowd was enthusiastic and receptive, wildly cheering on vocal opponents of animal agriculture including Wayne Pacelle, Paul Shapiro, Miyun Park, Gene Baur, and many others.

Both events provided vegan meals to attendees. In contrast to the lifestyle choices advocated for by the conference speakers, 97 percent of Americans enjoy meat, milk, and egg products as part of their diet. MAYBE THE HSUS AND PETA WILL PAY FOR THE 'PILL' FOR THE PIGS.....

TWO FOR THE ROAD

A man enters his local bar holding a frog and an iguana. He sets them down on the bar and says to the bartender, "I bet you $1000 that my frog here can sing any song you can think of." "Ok," says the bartender. "How 'bout 'Blue Moon'?" The man whispers something to the frog, and the frog starts singing blue moon. "That's amazing," says the bartender as he slaps down $1000. "I'll bet ya another $1000 that my iguana here can do that to." "Ok, I can believe a frog, but not an iguana. You're on. Have him sing the Star Spangled Banner." The man whispers something to the iguana and it sings the Star Spangled Banner. As the bartender hands over another $1000, a businessman comes up and says, "I just saw that and I was amazed. I want to buy your iguana for $100,000." The man said ok, and he exchanged the iguana for the money and the businessman left. The bartender said "What are you nuts?! You could have made millions with that iguana!" The man said "Oh, the iguana can't sing. The frog's a ventriloquist."

Boudreaux gets a job with BP helping with the cleanup. He reports for work and is told to speak to a supervisor about his assignment. He finds the man and asks what he is supposed to do. The supervisor tells him to go to the animal shelter and clean the pelicans.

Two hours later, Boudreaux comes up to the supervisor and says, "Okay...dey all cleaned. You want me to cook some rice?"
